If you must do confirmation theory, do it this way

Prof. David Miller

University of Warwick

Fans of uncertain (inductive) inference usually think of it as a generalization of deductive inference in which the conclusion is made probable by the premises, rather than certain.

In this talk I shall suggest that probability is the wrong way to generalize deductive validity and to understand such uncertainty. There are repercussions in such areas as the law.